

THE INDIAN ADVOCATE.

VOL. XII.

MARCH, 1900.

No. 2.

TO OUR READERS.

THE first number contained a rather considerable amount of typographical errors. This was due to the double fact that the printing of the INDIAN ADVOCATE had been entrusted to entirely new hands, and that they were not as yet fully equipped with the necessary materiel. Under the circumstances, we did the best we could, and we added an extra leaf with the "Errata." The present number is undoubtedly an improvement, in every respect, upon the former. It is the desire of the editors to make gradually the little review as perfect as may be expected, taking into consideration, however, the limited resources now at our disposal and the many obstacles, due to location and distance, that hinder our progress. We have received a number of letters, encouraging us in our undertaking and expressing satisfaction with the newly-adopted form as well as the program announced. Most of our subscribers have renewed their subscription, and some new ones have increased the list. Thanks to all! We take the liberty of sending the present number to a great number of friends and acquaintances, with the hope that not a few may answer our appeal. We would be thankful for any suggestion that might aim at rendering our publication more useful and interesting. The Editors and Readers of the INDIAN ADVOCATE should form a kind of pious association, intent on the success of what constitutes a common cause: the
